Consumo mundial de combustibles fósiles alcanza récord histórico

El consumo mundial de combustibles fósiles alcanzó un récord histórico el año pasado, lo que hace que las emisiones superen los 40 gigatonnes de CO₂ por primera vez, según un informe mundial de energía.

A pesar de un aumento récord en el uso de energías renovables en 2024, el consumo de combustibles fósiles también continuó aumentando, según una revisión anual de la energía mundial realizada por el Instituto de Energía.

Un año récord en el consumo de energía

Juliet Davenport, presidenta del Instituto de Energía, dijo que el informe había revelado "otro año de récords en nuestro mundo hambriento de energía", incluido un récord en el consumo de combustibles fósiles, que aumentó un 1,5% hasta los 505 exajulios.

Los hallazgos ponen en peligro las esperanzas de los científicos climáticos de que 2024 sea recordado como el año en que las emisiones anuales alcanzaron su punto máximo antes de que la economía mundial de combustibles fósiles comience su declive terminal.

El Instituto de Energía, el organismo profesional global del sector energético, encontró que, si bien las emisiones de la industria energética pueden haber alcanzado un pico en las economías avanzadas, las economías en desarrollo continúan aumentando su dependencia del carbón, el gas y el petróleo.

El consumo de combustibles fósiles sigue siendo dominante

En general, los combustibles fósiles representaron el 81,5% de la energía primaria del mundo el año pasado, solo una pequeña disminución con respecto al 82% del año anterior, según el informe, incluso cuando las granjas eólicas y solares generaron cantidades récord de electricidad limpia.

El informe, elaborado por consultores de KPMG y Kearney, encontró que la energía eólica y solar aumentaron un 13% el año pasado hasta alcanzar un récord de 4.748 teravatio-hora en 2024.

Pero eso no fue suficiente para igualar el creciente consumo de energía primaria del mundo, que aumentó un 2% el año pasado hasta alcanzar un récord de 620 exajulios y llevó a un mayor uso de combustibles fósiles.

La revisión encontró que el mundo siguió consumiendo gas a un ritmo constante en 2024, mientras que el consumo de carbón aumentó un 1,6% y la demanda de petróleo aumentó un 2% hasta alcanzar los 100 millones de barriles al día por primera vez.

Simon Virley, jefe de energía y recursos naturales del Reino Unido en KPMG, dijo: "En un año en que hemos visto la contribución de las energías renovables alcanzar un nuevo récord, la creciente demanda mundial de energía significa que la participación de los combustibles fósiles sigue siendo prácticamente invariable en alrededor del 80% durante otro año más".

Nick Wayth, director ejecutivo del Instituto de Energía, agregó que el "lento" progreso de la transición energética "disfraza historias de energía diversa que se desarrollan en diferentes geografías".

"En las economías avanzadas, observamos señales de que la demanda de combustibles fósiles está llegando a su punto máximo, en contraste con las economías del sur global para las que el desarrollo económico y las mejoras en la calidad de vida siguen impulsando el crecimiento de los combustibles fósiles", dijo Wayth.

El informe encontró que, en la India, el consumo de combustibles fósiles aumentó un 8% el año pasado, lo que coincidió con el aumento en la demanda total de energía para representar el 89% de todo el uso de energía. Esto significó que, por primera vez, más carbón se utilizó en la India que en Europa y América del Norte combinadas, según el informe.

En Europa, los combustibles fósiles cayeron por debajo del 70% del uso de energía primaria por primera vez desde la Revolución Industrial, impulsados por la caída de la demanda y el crecimiento de la energía renovable.

La demanda de gas en Europa en particular ha continuado disminuyendo desde la invasión a gran escala de Ucrania por parte de Rusia en 2024, lo que hizo que las importaciones de gas por tubería a Europa colapsaran. Según el informe, la demanda de gas cayó un 7% en 2024, después de una caída del 13% el año anterior.
